SLAVERY

Source Material and Critical Literature

In 1955 the Lost Cause Press initiated its Microform publishing program with the Kentucky Culture series. This collection includes basic source material on the history of the Southern Black. Source material on slavery, reaching back into the period of exploration and discovery has been included in Kentucky Culture and other series, of which catalogues are available.

A major service to American historical scholarship has been the publication in microfiche of the Anti-Slavery Propaganda Pamphlet collection in the Oberlin College Library. A list is available upon request.

We are rounding out this collection with the publication in microfiche of some 2000 volumes of Slavery, Source Material and Critical Literature. Selections have been made from Dwight L. Dumond, A bibliography of Antislavery literature in America, (University of Michigan Press, 1961), and the subject group under "Slavery" in the full card catalogue of the Library of Congress. There are no duplications of titles previously issued in our other collections.

Professor Dumond dedicated a lifetime of research to the Slavery issue, and his bibliography is definitive. The collections of the Library of Congress represent the basic documents which our national library has brought together as source material on American history.

Since slavery (and, in our own times, race relations) is more than a local political and economic issue, the Slavery, Source Material and Critical Literature collection includes material on slavery in other parts of the world, above all the West Indies and South America. The Library of Congress collections are particularly rich in this area.

Libraries need only match the microfiche editions with the catalog cards and the material is then immediately available to readers. In addition, all subscribers will be given a copy of the Dumond bibliography.

Duplicates of items already in a library collection may be returned for credit within six months after receipt of shipment.

A full set of catalog cards will be provided with standing order.
